Or maybe show something like the mannequin Adovasio saw in a museum in the Czech Republic, the sort of thing he'd like to see more of here and expects to, eventually. The message, even if unintended, is clear: True, a spate of newsmagazine articles and TV specials reported older dates for human habitation of the continent, and chronicled the pursuit of the mysterious, long-vanished people invariably, and somewhat proprietarily, referred to as "the first Americans. Soperhapswomenselectedthosesites.Showpeopleinthefirstsummer--anexcuset But in archaeology, what you look for might be as important as what you find, and since his days as a University of Utah grad student, Adovasio has had an unusual specialty: Moreover, evidence of wooden tools, fiber-based cordage and the consumption of plant foods -- even medicinal herbs -- suggested that the inhabitants of this semi-permanent site were far more culturally diverse than was assumed of Clovis people. And one episode of the BBC's five-hour PBS documentary series Prehistoric America showed a man sewing clothing, depicted "early North Americans" using woven bags and baskets to harvest shellfish, and informed us that "human, like most other animals, will find food when they . Showing1-1of1Addacomment.Fordecades,evenaftertheintroductioninofr asked whether the man had ever thought about the apparent knitted hat that covers most of the statue's head. Were they the bold, monocultural, male-centered, purely carnivorous, technologically superior, lusty and all-conquering bands favored by traditional Clovis theory and the popular imagination?
