The ancient sandstone bridge abutments still remain and local residents report the howling has only become louder in recent years. One of many purported crybaby bridges is located near Doylestown, Ohio in an area known as Rogue's Hollow.

Locals claim that late at night if you shut your vehicle engine off, kill your A second story is that a woman was being chased down the road and when she got to the bridge she did not know the area and thought that there was a river underneath, so she jumped over the bridge and when she saw the train tracks screamed all the way down to her death. Legend has it that the baby was never found, and that if the bridge is visited at midnight the baby's cry can be heard and sometimes accompanied by a strange blue light.
