He considered that his interaction with students had been enriched because he no longer controlled the information, and because students could email or chat to him outside of class hours. Their average years of computer use was In-house expertise in preparing curricula for distance delivery was limited Half of the staff interviewed had at some time taken an online, distance education course, but in some cases their experience was negative. They also have responsibility to update their course contents following periodic reviews by industry advisors. Four said there was no advantage and the remainder provided no comments.
At the beach I'm the one taking photos of the sand and seaweed instead of the view staff were enthusiastic about modern technologies, open to learning new skills and dedicated to delivering a high quality product to students, and even though there was constructive intervention from managers, the development process was very difficult. Management recognized the need for additional expertise, and resolved to pursue future curriculum revisions separately from online migration.
