His reliance on simple, concrete diction and the no-nonsense sequence of the declarative sentence gives his poems steadiness and imbues them with a tone of sincere authority. Everything must be imagined before being created, from a simple meal to a sophisticated skyscraper.

For me it was a deliberate statement on the nature of the subject matter, and indeed, recently, for example, someone asked me [because of Biopsy, one of the poems in the collection] if I'd had cancer. Perhaps the reason that it has been picked up and commented on so much is precisely because people sense it's risky - and they're all thinking, "did she dare say that?"

They do not exist. Even when we are young, we glimpse it sometimes, and no doubt you can see what your friends thought of this book, please sign up. Hall died on June 23, in Wilmot, New Hampshire.
