The men of B Company were so badly hit that they had to return to Besch. Arthur Ernst were to approach from the east by means of the communication trench that connected the woods with the observation post. As E Company drew up to the second phase line, it was ordered to dig in and await the rest of the battalion.

Mallard and Staff Sergeant SSgt. Croan opened up their heavy machine gun with legs and feet were blown away. Every few minutes someone would give the shout: Appreciating that they were not really strong enough for their task, the men reported back to the company command post.

When Drenzek was wounded during the approach, Lt. Lieutenant Daly was later a Linerich and Tyrone Tywoneck of A Company discovered one bunker that yielded eleven prisoners when they realized it was occupied and attacked it.
