Politicians at all levels, including at the local level, often provide services to constituents in return for votes, and not because they are the section of population that most require those services. Such stories have not been told in enough detail in the overall narrative on Africa's decentralisation efforts.

At the same time, the work of these authors is held together by a commitment to... The contents of Decentralization and Reform in Africa pages should be of particular interest to scholars working on decentralisation in Africa, policymakers in African ministries, aid agencies, and civil society organisations working on the delivery of essential services in Africa. In this case, the authors Ojebode, Onyishi and Aremu tell us that perceptions are closely related to expectations that are built through the practice of local democracy, in particular through campaign promises made in a context of very limited resources, an echo of the impact of clientelism in Ghana. What is the significance of all this information? In fact, there has been a dearth of information in the African research context is a difficult one.
